

Schuster Law Expands Nursing Home Abuse Case Focus

August 20, 2026

MEDIA, PA - August 20, 2026 -

Schuster Law has announced an expanded focus on nursing home abuse matters involving residents and families in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, as part of the firm's personal injury practice. The development reflects the firm's continued handling of civil claims involving allegations of neglect, abuse, inadequate supervision, and failures in resident care.

"Nursing home cases require a detailed review of the circumstances surrounding a resident's care, the available records, and the responsibilities of the parties involved," said Ken Schuster, Esq., attorney at Schuster Law. "The firm's approach is to examine those facts and explain the civil legal process associated with the matter."

Nursing home abuse litigation can involve allegations concerning the conduct of individual caregivers, facility operators, management companies, contractors, or other parties responsible for resident care. A civil claim may examine whether a facility followed applicable policies, staffing procedures, reporting requirements, and care plans in connection with an alleged incident.

Records often form an important part of the factual review. Medical charts can document a resident's condition and treatment, while facility records can identify staffing assignments, incident reports, care plans, internal communications, and other information connected with the period under examination. Attorneys may also review correspondence with family members, photographs, witness accounts, regulatory records, and other available documentation when evaluating the circumstances.

Pennsylvania nursing facilities operate within a regulatory framework that addresses resident rights and standards of care. Civil litigation is a separate process from regulatory enforcement, and the legal issues in an individual matter depend on the facts, the parties involved, and the available evidence. Allegations may concern physical abuse, neglect, medication issues, falls, pressure injuries, inadequate hygiene, insufficient supervision, or other conditions affecting a resident.

The expanded case focus at Schuster Law includes evaluation of matters arising from nursing home and long-term care settings. The firm reviews information concerning the resident, the facility, the reported event, and the resulting medical or financial consequences to determine what legal issues may be relevant under Pennsylvania civil law.

Nursing home matters can involve several different legal relationships. A facility may employ staff directly, use outside contractors, or operate as part of a larger ownership or management structure. Identifying those relationships can help determine which individuals or entities had responsibility for specific aspects of a resident's care during the period at issue.

Timing can also affect the evaluation of a civil claim. Pennsylvania law establishes deadlines for filing different types of legal actions, and the applicable period can depend on the nature of the claim and the circumstances surrounding the alleged conduct. Legal review can include determining when an incident occurred, when resulting injuries were identified, and what records remain available.

The firm's nursing home abuse practice also addresses the procedural stages that can follow an initial case assessment. Those stages may include gathering records, identifying responsible parties, reviewing medical information, consulting appropriate professionals when necessary, filing court documents, conducting discovery, and evaluating evidence produced by the parties.

Schuster Law serves clients in personal injury and civil litigation matters and handles cases involving allegations of injury caused by the conduct of individuals, businesses, and institutions. The firm's work involving long-term care facilities applies the same fact-development process to allegations arising in nursing homes and related residential care environments.

The Delaware County focus provides geographic context for the firm's current announcement without changing the legal standards that govern nursing home cases throughout Pennsylvania. Individual claims remain dependent on their own facts, and the existence of an injury or adverse outcome does not by itself establish civil liability.
